My comment is in regards to the change that states:

"Noncustodial parents could pay less child support if they spend at least 52 nights a year with their children."

Just because a court order states that the noncustodial parent is suppose to have the children that amount of time, doesn't mean that it is actually happens.

In my situation, my exhusband is "suppose" to take the children every other weekend, and that would equal out to be 52 nights a year. He has taken the kids only 3 weekends this year as of June 19th.

I would suggest that if that goes into effect than the noncustodial parent must prove that he/she actually takes the kids that amount of time. Otherwise they can say they do even if they do not.
